Title: Socratic Dialectic and the Resolution of Fallacy in Plato’s Euthydemus. In progress.

Abstract: It is a familiar claim that the Euthydemus champions Socratic argumentation over sophistical or eristic reasoning. However, no consensus exists regarding either the nature or philosophical significance of Socrates’ treatment of the fallacies he confronts. I argue that a careful reading of the dialogue reveals that the Socratic response to fallacious reasoning is conducted at two different levels of philosophical sophistication. Socrates relies upon the resources of Socratic dialectic in responding to sophisms due to ignorance of refutation. Insofar as Socratic dialectic is grounded in a grasp of the nature of genuine refutation, the objections it raises to false refutation are fully explanatory. On the other hand, Socrates employs various self-refutation arguments against theses which depend on false assumptions regarding the nature of predication---for example, the thesis that false speaking is impossible. It is however characteristic of Socratic dialectic that this method of examination cannot explain why the sophists’ theses are false. The Socratic response to fallacy in these cases is non-explanatory in this sense. On the other hand, these limitations on Socratic expertise are overcome in other passages in the dialogue which are replete with clues to the reader that point to a genuine explanation and resolution of the sophists’ arguments for their various theses. In particular, the reader is invited at every turn to modify, clarify, or reject various assumptions made by the brothers regarding the nature of predication. By these indirect means Plato initiates a research program into what I call higher dialectic. This theory, which only receives explicit formulation in the Sophist, is conceptually rich enough to expose and dispose of the various false assumptions upon which the sophists’ theses rest. I conclude that the Euthydemus is concerned to identify Socratic dialectic as only a part of philosophy, and to locate and strictly delimit its epistemological status as lying above eristic and the rhetorical arts, but below that of dialectic as that is conceived in the Republic and even later dialogues---thus anticipating the Sophist’s conception of Socrates as the practitioner of a ‘noble sophistry’, (γενναία σοφιστική, 231b3-8) and the elenchus as a propaedeutic to philosophy, which purges the soul of false beliefs.

Title: Reason and Imagination in Plato’s Timaeus. Book proposal in progress for Philosophia Antiqua (Brill).

Abstract: The focus of this book project is the difficult passage (70a-72d) wherein Plato explains the manner in which reason communicates with the appetitive part of the soul. I defend the thesis that Plato's theory of mental representation entails that the objective 'input' that is a single species of rectilinear motion (e.g. sound) and that is productive of a single species of cognitive awareness (e.g. hearing) is 'parsed' into three distinct modes of mental representation, depending on which organ, and which part of the soul (reason, the spirited part, or appetite) is affected by the rectilinear motion in question. I also attempt to make sense of Plato's curious 'rotational' model of the twin divine orbits of the rational part and the joint contribution of these structures to moral deliberation. Finally, I explain Plato's straight-faced assurances that appetite is the locus of divination, despite the appetitive soul part's incapacity to form even the simplest beliefs.
